There are few positions in our system of government where the quality of the person serving in that position more directly determines how well the system itself serves the public than that of a judge. Every day, judges are tasked with the incredible work of finding practical solutions to complex problems and making just rulings in the face of great controversy.

I would like to serve on the Judicial Nominating Commission because to do so would allow me to not only serve my colleagues in the profession of law, but also the people of Tennessee by attempting to find and recommend those candidates for appointment who possess legal intellect, a just conscience, and heart for service to the people. My goal would be to help my fellow commissioners find those people with the humility to possess the great power given a judge coupled with the intellectual capacity to use that authority within the law. No greater responsibility can be given to a person than the power of determining the course that another will take.

We have been blessed in our state with many good judges. From our local municipal judges to those from our community serving on the various appellate courts, I have had the opportunity to observe great people become great judges. In my mind, the opportunity to contribute to finding the next great judge is a chance not easily passed up. I have followed this Commission's work over the years and believe that the opportunity to help shape the composition of the judiciary to best serve the public is an exceptional one. I look hopefully to that opportunity.
